Feeling like a woman again

When 23-year-old Auckland woman, Amanda (surname withheld for privacy reasons) stepped up her running to keep fit, it had a side-effect she hadn't bargained on. She lost weight and, as she puts it, the first to go were her boobs.

'NOW, I LIKE DRESSING UP AND LOOKING IN THE MIRROR' — AMANDA

"I was very flat-chested and I didn't feel like a woman anymore," she recalls. Not happy feeling like that, she began to think about having breast augmentation.

"I asked my partner if he would mind, and he didn't, though there were a few girlfriends who said I didn't need it, and that I should be happy with what I had, but I found that hard, coming from girls with decent-sized chests," Amanda says.

After giving it serious thought, she made the decision to go ahead with breast augmentation surgery. She went into the clinic on a Friday in May 2007, and was back at work on the Monday, feeling very happy with the results.

"I had no idea how easy it would be, and how happy with the job I would be," she says. "Now, I like dressing up and looking in the mirror, and it has not stopped me from doing anything that is important to me, as I like to work out and run.

My partner is happy with the results, too.

"I really would recommend this procedure to women who feel they need it. Murray didn't rush me into any decisions and made me feel very comfortable throughout"
